New Teacher Website Models Environmental Protection, Conservation

Tucson, Arizona -- June 29, 2004 -- Often schools promote environmental studies in the classroom only to throw away half-used workbooks and extra, unnecessary copies.

TheLessonMachine.Com, a subscription based curriculum site, offers a viable alternative. “In addition to printing activity sheets only on an as needed basis,” says Myscha Theriault, program founder, “teachers and homeschool parents with computer and internet access can view lesson plans and instructional guidelines digitally. This saves money, paper and filing time.”

The company feels it’s important to practice environmental responsibility, and further demonstrates this belief through the practice of telecommuting. “Most of our team members work from home,” says Theriault. “This saves unnecessary commuter traffic pollution, fuel consumption and gas costs, putting hard earned money back into the pockets of working professionals.”
