TheLessonMachine.Com Reduces Fuel Consumption, Pollution Through Telecommuting / Workers Also Save on Gas Costs

Tucson, Arizona – May 25, 2004 -- Pollution caused from excessive commuter traffic is not a new issue. Neither is the ever fluctuating cost of a gallon of gasoline. Telecommuting provides a viable solution for both. TheLessonMachine.Com, a for-fee curriculum site, uses telecommuting as its primary staffing model, believing corporate success and environmental responsibility CAN go hand in hand. “Families today must watch their budgets closer than ever before,” says Myscha Theriault, president and company founder. “Reducing a professional’s monthly fuel consumption does more than help protect the environment. It puts hard earned cash back into the pockets of the people who earned it.”

When asked how much of a difference telecommuting can actually make in a family’s monthly budget, Theriault had this to say, “The impact is dramatic. I know one working mother who consumes a half tank of gas just on her daily commute to the office. A tank of gas for her particular vehicle costs roughly thirty – three dollars. That’s over eighty dollars for every five day work week. Calculate that over a one month period. I don’t know of a single family or working professional who wouldn’t consider that savings dramatic.”

Numerous telecommuting opportunities are available at TheLessonMachine.Com. Visit the site today and submit a contact form for more information. Free samples of products offered on the site are also available for download.
